THE STATE SALARY GRAB.

IN LESS THAN TWO WEEKS the people of Utah will know whether their state officials are conscientious public servants and scrupulous guardians of the state treasury, or just plain salary-grabbers who care more for an advance in their own pay than they do for the esteem of their constituents.

The proposition of some of the present incumbents to add to their own salaries by the simple process of having the warrants made out by the state auditor—himself a beneficiary—will strike the taxpayers as a vicious abuse of official power. And this plan is the more vicious because it is in direct defiance of the constitution as construed by some of the best lawyers practicing in Salt Lake. Well-informed attorneys say that it would be impossible to find three lawyers of the first rank in the state who will maintain that the salary law passed by the last legislature applies to the present set of officials. Yet, in spite of all this unanimity of opinion, these state officials are going ahead bravely with the proposition to pay themselves more salary than the best legal ability in the state says they are entitled to. The scheme is to have the auditor, who will profit $500 each year, draw the warrants and the treasurer, who will also profit $500 each year, pay them. The attorney general, who likewise stands to make an annual gain of $500 if the grab succeeds, has with grave professional decorum announced his purpose, if called upon for an opinion on the subject, to refer it to some uninterested lawyer. Of course, if he is not asked for an opinion he will accept an increased warrant, together with all the other goods the gods may provide.

The whole affair as now outlined in the public mind is a disgrace to the state—and most disgraceful of all is the rumor in circulation for months past that this grab is only preliminary to another which will involve an even more violent disregard of the constitution.

The officials of the state cannot afford to pay themselves an increased salary until the proposition involved has been thoroughly threshed out by competent lawyers and a decision rendered by judges who have not passed upon it already either unofficially or otherwise.

HAZEN S. PINGREE.

THE DEATH OF EX-GOVERNOR HAZEN S. PINGREE in London brings to a pathetic close one of the most picturesque careers in American political history. Since his first election to the office of mayor of Detroit in 1889, the man known "the world over" as Potato Pingree was constantly in the public eye. By his enemies he was accused of playing to the galleries and attempting to bend everything so as to further his own political ambitions. By his friends, and he had a host of them in his own city and state, he was looked upon as incorruptibly honest and the unwavering champion of the common people. Political leaders disliked him, for he would not be led; but his popularity was such that he invariably whipped them into line, and in several campaigns the former bosses of Republican politics in Michigan were his unwilling followers.

Hazen S. Pingree was born in Maine, where he was brought up on his father's farm. In the civil war he served as a private, was captured and spent several months in a southern prison, where, so his British physicians believe, were sown the seeds of the disease that finally killed him. Going to Detroit at the close of the war, he worked for some time in a shoe factory. Then securing a "lerner" he started up a small shop of his own, which he built up into one of the biggest boot and shoe factories of the country.

Up to the time of his nomination for mayor he had never figured conspicuously in politics. But at that time Detroit was overwhelmingly Democratic, and the Republican leaders were forced to turn to some man in whom the public would have confidence. Pingree was a successful business man. His blunt and cordial manner had made him a host of friends. The politicians thought such a man might succeed in carrying the city, and they offered him the nomination, but it was not until a petition had been circulated and signed by nearly all the business men of the city that Pingree accepted. After a brisk campaign he was elected, and was three times re-elected to the office of mayor.

During the time he was at the head of municipal affairs in Detroit he inaugurated the city potato scheme which gave him world-wide fame. During the winter months following '93, when thousands of men were out of work, Mayor Pingree requested all owners of vacant property in the city to send in a list of such places where they would be willing to have the poor utilize for growing potatoes or other garden truck. The scheme proved a great success and hundreds of families were saved from destitution or depending on public charity. Mayor Pingree's administration was also notable for the successful fight he made in favor of cheap street railway transportation.

In 1895 he was elected governor, and was re-elected again in 1898. During his terms in the gubernatorial chair he advocated a more equitable system of taxation whereby corporations and especially the railroads would be made to pay their just share. He stuck to the Republican party, but was usually at odds with its leaders. He was an early advocate of free silver, but he ceased attacking the gold standard when nominated for governor. He believed in the government ownership of railroads. His plan was to have the railroads owned and operated by the states under federal supervision, arguing that the people would be more conservative in building new lines where the cost would come directly out of the pockets of the community most benefited by the line instead of out of the whole country, as would be the case were the federal government the owner.

The trip which ended in his death was begun by Mr. Pingree some time ago. Armed with credentials from Mr. Chamberlain, he visited South Africa and made a close study of both the Boer and British sides of the situation there. He was returning to his native land when the fatal illness overtook him and his last days were made more pathetic by his constant longing to be back in America. William T. Stead, who was a warm friend of Mr. Pingree, and who was a constant visitor during his last illness, writes thus of his death:

"The career of one of the most notable of modern Americans is closed; a man who for strength of character, firmness of purpose, indomitable energy and unshaken public spirit, presents an example to two worlds."

This eulogy, though doubtless inspired more by personal friendship than calm analysis of the man's life, contains much that is true. He was often an extremist, and only on the theory of chivalry for a man who had been deserted and made a scapegoat by his party can Mr. Pingree's most loyal friends explain his alliance with Alger, a man who at all times stood for much that he bitterly opposed. But with all his faults and vagaries, Pingree accomplished much practical good for his city and state, and his death will be sincerely mourned by the people of Detroit and Michigan, who had been preparing to give him a royal reception on his return from abroad.

ANOTHER TARIFF BOOMERANG.

THE RELATIONS OF THIS COUNTRY with Russia continue to furnish beautiful illustrations of the incompatibility of a great foreign commerce and a high protective tariff. We are also taught that the United States has no copyright on protection, and that when the exigencies of commercial warfare make it advisable, other countries are quite willing to resort to the tariff as a weapon of offense and defense.

The latest trade arrangement between America and Russia was precipitated by the present administration's partiality to Mr. Rockefeller's infant industry, the good oil trust. In fact, it is noticeable that both this and the former altercation with Russia, which promise to result in the loss of several hundred thousand dollars' worth of foreign trade to America, were brought on by legislation and treasury department rulings favorable to big trusts. In the first instance it was the sugar combine, and now it is the Standard Oil company, for whose sake the government has seen fit to make a commercial treaty with Russia.

In behalf of the sugar trust the treasury department ruled that Russian sugar was subject to an additional duty over and above that charged other nations. Russia promptly retaliated by placing a prohibitive tariff on American machinery. The result was that this country lost a good customer for its iron manufactures, while no one has been able to discover anything that has been gained by excluding the trifling amount of Russian sugar that had been coming to America, except that it made the trust that much freer from competition.

The last piece of retaliation which Russia has resorted to is also the result of a treasury department ruling, which applies the tariff to Russian petroleum imported into this country. In return the czar has imposed a high duty on white resin, galipot and bicyclet from America. As the American export trade in resin and bicyclet is quite large and the Russian shipments of petroleum to this country very insignificant, the loss is mainly on this side of the water.

It is not probable that other manufacturers will take kindly to having their trade sacrificed for the benefit of the Standard Oil company and the sugar trust. They will find little consolation in the talk about world markets. The result will be a falling out between the chief beneficiaries of the tariff, and when this happens, the home consumer will run some chance of getting his dues. The administration at present shows no inclination of giving up its protection of the trusts, but the point is being reached when either this must be done or the campaign for the world's markets must be given up for the success with which Russia is fighting us at our own game will invite other European nations to do likewise. A good share of the trusts will find this far from profitable, and what the administration has declined to do for the consumer it may consent to do when some of the good trusts take up cudgels against it.

Tourists are pouring into Salt Lake in such numbers that the rattle of the Brigham street trolley cars is drowned in the click of Kodak slides.

For the first time in the history of the island, Cuban cars are being tickled by the soul-thrilling buzz of the presidential bee.

Russia is evidently of the belief that sauce that is good for the bear is also good for the eagle.

Many Beautiful Weddings Were Solemnized Yesterday.

An elaborate wedding of last evening was that of Miss Bertha Meyer, daughter of Mrs. Rosa Meyer and the late Gustave Meyer, and Mr. Milton D. Joseph of St. Louis, Mo. The marriage was solemnized at 6 o'clock at the family residence, 315 East Second South street, in the presence of about forty relatives of the bride and groom, Rabbi L. R. Reynolds officiating. The house presented a strikingly beautiful appearance. Tall palms in handsome jardinières were grouped artistically about the rooms. From the alcove in the bow window was pendant a bell of white carnations, sweet peas and ferns, while below, attached to the wall by two white curtains, which were sprayed with fern leaves, was a heart of pink carnations, pierced with an arrow of sweet alyssum and white sweet peas, and crowned with a bow of white carnations. The mantels were covered with clusters of lilies and ferns. Tall baskets of white roses adorned each side of the fireplace, which was laden with asparagus fern. Balls of carnations were suspended from the arches between the doors, and every where was a floral display of exceptional beauty.

The folding doors between the library and dining room were thrown open, and occupying the long sweep of the two rooms was the banquet table, glittering with exquisite silver and gracefully adorned in roomy ferns. At the appointed time Christensen's orchestra played Lohengrin's "Bridal March," and the bride entered the room, escorted by her brother, leader Meyer, and attended by Mrs. Vera Stiebel of Boston as matron of honor and Miss Hattie Barnett and Miss Janie Barnett as bridesmaids. Mr. A. L. Jacobs acted as best man.

The bride wore a handsome gown of white tulle, made on train, and the skirt being trimmed with pleatings of white liberty silk and lace. The bodice was tucked and elaborately trimmed in deep black lace, with tulle veil and shower bouquet of white roses completed the exquisite costume. The matron of honor was attired in white tulle, with trimmings of Valenciennes lace. Miss Hattie Barnett was gowned in pink silk mull, and Miss Janie Barnett in cream silk. Pink roses were their flowers. A blue enamel pin, set with pearls and diamonds, the gift of the bride, was worn by the bride. The groom wore a suit of black and white, with a white shirt and a white tie.

After the ceremony a sumptuous wedding supper was served. The bride and groom left for an extended visit on the coast. The bride's traveling costume was a gray tailor made suit, with gray hat. Mr. and Mrs. Joseph will be at home at 315 East Second South street after July 15.

Among those who were present at the wedding were the following relatives from the east: Mrs. H. H. Stiebel, a sister of Mr. Joseph; Miss Vera Stiebel, Mr. Herbert Stiebel of Boston; Mr. and Mrs. David Joseph of St. Louis; Mr. and Mrs. Simon Freedman; Misses Beatrice and Myrtle Friedman; Mr. Jerome Friedman, Mr. Frederick Friedman, Mrs. Julius Kahn of Leadville, Miss Ruth Kahn and Mr. Lee Kahn.

A pretty carpet of rose petals for the bride's path.

During the reading of the marriage service, "Hearts and Flowers" was played softly on the piano. The bride wore a dainty costume of white chiffon trimmed in Valenciennes lace. She carried a shower bouquet of white roses. Miss Helene Creitzer was gowned in blue silk mull and held pink roses.

About 100 guests were present, and one room was filled with beautiful and useful gifts presented by the friends of the young couple.

In the dining hall were laid two beautifully decorated tables, around which the guests gathered after the ceremony and were served with a splendid banquet.
